Nonidentical Twins – Rabbi Josh Harris

Taking centre stage in this week's Parsha is the second patriarchal family: Yitzchak, Rivka, and their two sons, Yaakov and Esav. These twin brothers, Yaakov and Esav, were born with high hopes. They were born to the chosen son of Avraham and the righteous daughter of Betuel, growing up in a home filled with Torah values and G-d awareness. The Midrash (Bereishit Rabba 63:14) tells us that they both even went to the same school for the first 13 years of their lives. Yet, these two brothers couldn't be more different. At the end of their 13-year education, Yaakov went to the houses of study, a "wholesome man, abiding in tents" whilst Esav went to the houses of idol-worship, "one who knows hunting, a man of the field." How could two brothers, growing up in the house of Yitzchak and Rivka and receiving the same education, end up so far apart?

Rav Shimshon Raphael Hirsch, the brilliant 19th century German scholar, strikingly points an accusing finger at Yitzchak and Rivka for the educational failure of Esav. Yaakov and Esav were two unique individuals with separate strengths and interests. Yaakov was a man of the tent, someone who had the ability to sit for hours on end in study. Esav, on the other hand, was a man of the field, uninterested in formal study, whose strengths lay outside of the Beit Midrash. When two distinct individuals are educated in the same place with the same methods, developing the same habits and training them as one individual for a life of learning and meditation, one of them is bound to rebel. Yaakov drew from his education with an increasing desire, whereas Esav longed for the day he could throw away his books and pursue a life that played to his strengths. Rav Hirsch sharply concludes that had Yitzchak and Rivka succeeded in directing the boldness and strength in Esav's soul towards the service of Hashem, then instead of being a mighty hunter, Esav would have been mighty before Hashem and sealed a covenant with the spirit of Yaakov!

Yitzchak and Rivka forgot the great Jewish understanding of education, as laid out by Shlomo Hamelech in Mishlei (22:6), חֲנֹךְ לַנַּעַר עַל־פִּי־דַרְכּוֹ – "Educate a child according to his own path." They provided their two very different sons with one identical education. For one son, it was perfectly suitable. For the other, it was every reason to stray from the straight path. Education that is not appropriate to the child's nature causes rebellion and detachment from the path in which he is raised. No matter a person's nature, everyone has a path that can lead them to a fulfilling life of Torah observance. A life of service of Hashem is not set aside solely for those that are able to sit and learn. Everyone has a different path that is unique for them in their Avodat Hashem and the key is knowing how to unlock that path in an educational setting.

While we often view this as a message for young parents and educators, it is also a call to each and every one of us to evaluate our own strengths and tendencies and be self-aware of the educational exposure we require in order to grow religiously. Education continues for as long as a person is alive, and it is incumbent upon each person to know at each stage of their life which educational style best suits them and will allow them to continue exploring and developing their own Jewish journey.
