What does slavery in the Torah really mean? By Rabbi Josh Harris

Slavery and Torah appear to be diametrically opposed. Torah constantly champions the value of looking out for those less fortunate, while slavery subjugates our fellow human beings and designates them as subordinates. With the discussion of slavery being raised once again in this week's Parsha, we are compelled to ask the following question. How can we comprehend the inclusion of slavery within our Halachic system which is built on the foundations, amongst others, of love your neighbour as yourself and that everyone is created in the image of G-d?

What the Torah calls slavery is actually just a way of embracing the lowest class in society; which is not actually slavery at all in the way we understand the word. Let's explore. Rav Avraham Yitzchak Kook (1865-1935), the first Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi of Israel and is considered to be one of the fathers of Religious Zionism, coined the terms "legal" slavery and "natural" slavery. The reality of life is that there is rich and poor, weak and strong. A person with great wealth will often hire a person with less wealth to do his work. Due to their socio-economic standing, these people are considered "natural" slaves. Rav Kook uses the example of coal miners. Coal miners work of their own free will but are in effect slaves to their employers. A mine owner who is devoid of all morals and ethics only cares about profits. For him, it would be irrelevant whether there is enough light and air in the mine for his workers, or even if this work shortens the life expectancy of his workers. If anything happens to his employees, he would simply find new ones.

Rav Kook explains that G-d anticipated the reality of "natural" slavery and legislated a system of "legal" slavery where the wealthy owner has a financial interest to look after the life and well-being of their worker. The "legal" slave described in the Torah is a lifeline given to a member of society who sees no way out but to automatically assume the role of "natural" slavery. He is in a socio-economic position which forces him into this reality. A large number of the laws within this system demand the wealthy owner to put the interests of their worker first. The Rambam codifies in Hilchot Avadim that the wealthy owner is commanded to feed their worker before themselves, to clothe them, to not burden them with unnecessary labour and to deal with them in a kind and polite manner. The Torah itself describes how it is incumbent upon the wealthy owner to ensure the worker's family are also taken care of, to not split them up, and to provide a home within his own home. It's not slavery; it's a lifeline.

In accordance with this understanding, the Torah states that in the event that the 'slave' loses a limb at the hands of their superior, he is automatically free. Historically, amputation was a common punishment handed out to slaves. Various commentators point out that the Torah's inclusion of this law is another example of how the Torah is coming to eliminate the natural behaviour shown to those less fortunate and attempting to establish a system which embraces them instead.

The "legal" slavery of the Torah upholds the moral and ethical system which we associate the Torah with. "Legal" slavery looks out for the less fortunate, provides them with a home, food, clothing, and an employer who has in mind his worker's best interests. This new understanding can breath a fresh perspective in what otherwise may seem contradictory to Torah ethics.

The Disputation by Hyam Maccoby

TICKETS WILL BE AVAILABLE SOON

Referred to by Rabbi Lord Jonathan Sacks z''l as 'a powerful reconstruction of one of the most fascinating but ultimately tragic encounters between Jews and Christians in the Middle Ages' The Disputation showcases the dramatic debate of 1263 in the court of Spanish King James I of Aragon, between Nahmanides, a leading Jewish medieval philosopher, kabbalist and commentator and the Dominican friar

(a converted Jew) Pablo Christiani.

The subject of this debate was whether Jesus was the Messiah. A fraught debate ensued with any number of potential and actual complications for the Jews….

Kinloss is putting on The Disputation soon and casting is now underway. We are looking for actors willing to be a local star.

Would you or someone you know like to audition?

If so, please email Sarah Davis at sarah@dramaticsarah.co.uk
