What's Mine Is His

Parshat Ki Teitze is the parsha with the most Mitzvot in the Torah. It covers a vast range of topics, many associated with social order and creating a functional and ethical society.

We are introduced to the Mitzva of Shichecha, forgetting the fallen sheaf, a commandment which at first may seem very standard but with a closer inspection also appears to be quite odd.

The Mitzvah of Shichecha essentially appears to be one of charity. It commands that when one is harvesting their field, any fallen and forgotten sheafs must be left for those less fortunate. The farmer is not allowed to go back and collect them for himself. Rav Shimshon Rephael Hirsch points out that all the other Mitzvot relating to giving charity in the field (such as leaving certain areas available for the poor to collect) were already listed for us earlier on in Sefer Vayikra. Why was Shichecha not include there?

The 20th century Torah scholar, Nechama Leibowitz, notes that unlike all the other commandments to give to the poor, Shichecha is done unconsciously. It seems odd to suggest that helping the poor would come from forgetfulness or a mere mistake. Charity is given with intent and with goodwill. Would being forced to give charity from that which one forgot or dropped be an effective means of fostering generous and charitable character? Or would it perhaps breed resentment in the farmer towards the poor? It's easy to imagine a scenario where a farmer would try and be extra careful to not forget anything in order to not lose out on that crop; after all, he would have already fulfilled the other commandments to leave parts of his field for the poor.

Rav Hirsch points out that the emphasis in the pasuk is very much on the farmer rather than on the receiver: "When you reap your harvest in your field, and you forget a sheaf in the field, you shall not go again to get it. It shall be for the foreigner, for the orphan, and for the widow, so that Hashem your God may bless you in all the work of your hands." Perhaps the goal of Shichecha is to establish a certain mindset within the farmer. The goal is to uproot any of the "mine" mindset which may exist within him. Yes, all the other Mitzvot of giving charity from the field can work to achieve this, but none quite like Shichecha. In forgetting a sheaf and not being allowed to reclaim it, one inherently integrates the concept that no material item truly belongs to them, rather, all the field solely belongs to Hashem. By incorporating this understanding into one's outlook, they gain the awareness that all which they have truly belongs to Hashem. It is thus within His authority to distribute the crop as He pleases.
